Research and Communications Specialist, Hotı̀ ts'eeda

The Research and Communications Specialist provides research and communications support, develops research and communications products, and establishes and maintains processes to undertake Hotı̀ ts'eeda programs and services. A collegial team member who takes initiative and has a desire to learn, the incumbent will provide research, content development, and coordination support on projects shared between staff.

This junior position is ideal for new and recent graduates seeking to devote their energy to developing their skills working in a decolonized, innovative, and dynamic work environment. Ideal candidates will have a University degree in a related discipline (social sciences and humanities, health and education, physical and natural sciences, communications) and an interest in research, communications, and working with partners across the NWT to support wellness-related initiatives.

Secondments from other governments and organizations, and flexible work options are welcome.

This full-time 35 hours per week, two-year term position has a yearly salary range of $89,000-100,000, plus benefits.
